Location Information: Located in the center of Tokyo on a quiet, 12-acre site isolated from urban noise, the Japanese garden, in which Hotel Chinzanso Tokyo is situated, is one of Tokyo's most distinguished gardens in Japan. The Hotel has various scenic spots, including a beautiful landscape full of seasonal plants, flowers and trees and a historical site offering a variety of monumental and architectural works of great historical value.

Facility Information: Hotel Chinzanso Tokyo is comprised of three areas: the Hotel building, the Banquet building and the Japanese Garden. The Hotel has 265 guestrooms, 38 function rooms, 5 wedding chapels and shrines, and 8 restaurants, as well as one of the largest spas in Tokyo.

History of Chinzanso Garden:

For more than six centuries, the land surrounding Chinzanso has been home to wild camellias; it was previously known as Tsubakiyama (Camellia Hills). The area was featured in a wood-block print by the famed ukiyo-e wood-print artist Ando Hiroshige (1797-1858).

The current name of the garden, "Chinzanso," was bestowed by Aritomo Yamagata (1838-1922), the most influential member of the group of elderly statesmen known as the Genro in the Meiji (1868-1912) and Taisho (1912-26) eras. Having demonstrated a discerning talent for designing gardens in Kyoto and Odawara, Yamagata bought the site in 1878, and taking full advantage of its unique, rolling landscape, built the origins of Chinzanso, the rinsen kaiyu-style garden seen today.

In 1918, reflecting the wishes of Yamagata, the property was assigned to Heitaro Fujita, a baron and the second owner of Fujita Gumi, a leading general construction company prominent in the financial circles of the Kansai region.

Unfortunately, the gardens were destroyed during World War II, except for the Three-Storied Pagoda, the Shiratama Inari Shrine, the sacred tree some 500 years old, and one warehouse. Reconstruction commenced in 1948 under the direction of Eiichi Ogawa, the founder of Fujita Tourist Enterprises Co., Ltd., whose vision of building a green oasis in Tokyo, including the transplantation of more than 10,000 trees, was completed in 1952. Chinzanso was rebuilt into gardens that are now even more beautiful than in the past. Historically significant, the gardens today continue to attract many visitors.

On January 16, 1992, Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts joined forces with Fujita Kanko Inc. Hotels & Resorts to open the Four Seasons Hotel Tokyo at Chinzanso, the first of its kind in Asia. The business tie-up concluded on December 31, 2012, after which the two facilities combined to reopen as Hotel Chinzanso Tokyo.

One of the most noteworthy structures amongst the many historical sites in the gardens is the Three-Storied Pagoda, otherwise known as Entsukaku. Exactly when it was built is unknown, but it is estimated to have been constructed either in the Heian period (794-1192) or in the Muromachi period (1338-1573). The pagoda, originally located in Chikurinji Temple in Hiroshima Prefecture, was relocated to the Chinzanso garden in 1925 by Heitaro Fujita, and is one of the three oldest pagodas still remaining in Tokyo. Wishing to pass on this historic pagoda from generation to generation, Fujita Kanko Inc. carried out major restoration and seismic reinforcement work on the pagoda in 2010 and 2011; the wooden bodhisattva statue was respectfully enshrined at that time.

Many more historical remnants can also be seen in the gardens: the approximately 500-year-old Sacred Tree, Shiratama Inari Shrine, Hannyaji Ishidoro Stone Lantern, Seven Deities of Good Fortune, Rakan Stone Statues, Thirteen-Storied Pagoda, Kokosei Well, as well as natural beauty such as the Gojo Waterfall and the Tokyo Sea of Clouds.

From season to season—camellias and snow in winter, sakura trees in spring, fireflies and green buds in early summer, cooling summer and deep green later in the season, colorful foliage in autumn—Hotel Chinzanso Tokyo provides the beauty and scenery that has struck a chord within Japanese culture.

It was moved to Chinzanso in 1947.
